Business District Inspections

Village Building Department Inspector/Code Compliance Officer Joe Brandi, in a letter to merchants, says he will inspect interiors and exteriors of all commercial buildings to ensure compliance with Planning, Zoning, and Architectural Review Board codes.

Exterior inspections will focus on property maintenance including paint, facades, signage, parking lots, and dumpster maintenance and enclosures.

Interior inspections include window displays, and all Village codes related to health, safety, and fire protection. Also all complaints dealing with the commercial district will be addressed.

Joe Brandi can be reached for any questions, suggestions or complaints at 475-8942, Monday through Thursday from 9 to 3. All calls are confidential.

Media at March General Meeting

The meeting is Mar. 28, 7-9 p.m., in the downstairs conference room at Patchogue-Medford Library. This will be a free media/advertising event with various media representatives.

Congratulations Carol

Carol Proven (Floral Designs of Patchogue) is the 2006 Brookhaven Town Women's Services Business Woman of the Year. The award will be Mar. 23, 5:30 p.m. at the Meadow Club in Port Jefferson Station.

Progress Reported on Patchogue Hotel

The Patchogue Village Board on Feb. 28 set a Public Hearing for Tuesday, Mar. 7 at 7:30 p.m. to consider a Special Permit for a hotel project at the Four Corners.

Trustee Gerry Crean said that after two years of negotiations with seven different developers "we are very, very close to a deal being struck."

Crean has been sitting in on the talks involving Joel Furman, owner of the former Swezey's Department Store building at 1 West Main Street and the adjacent former Swezey's office building at 17 West Main Street. Crean says the developer, Hersha Hospitality Trust, needs village assurance on the level of density it wants before proceeding with the negotiations. Both Furman and Crean were quoted in the Long Island Advance as warning that there is a way to go yet before any deal is complete. A previous deal fell through last year.

Hersha is a Maryland based Real Estate Investment Trust (REIT) that is invested in what it calls "55 high quality hotels in high barrier to entry markets." The preliminary plans for Patchogue call for a mixed use development with both hotel and condominium units as well as restaurant and retail space.

Passing of the Sash

2006 St. Patrick's Parade Grand Marshal Brian X. Foley will formally receive his sash at a dinner March 17 at St. Francis De Sales, but he got to hold it last week as he got together for a photo opportunity with last year's Marshal Fr. Kevin Smith.

Customers with Disabilities

Making it possible for customers with disabilities to purchase your goods and services is an important part of complying with the Americans with Disabilities Act. This article (adapted from the ADA website) focuses on communication.

Under the ADA, businesses are expected to communicate effectively with customers who have vision, hearing, or speech disabilities, and are responsible for taking the steps that are needed for effective communication. Business owners or managers must decide what assistance is appropriate, depending on the nature of the communication and the customer's normal method of communication.

The rules are intentionally flexible. Different businesses may need different solutions, because the nature of their communications are different. Also, different customers need different solutions, because the nature of their disabilities are different.

Practical solutions

The aim is to figure out practical solutions that allow you to communicate with customers who have disabilities, fit with your type of business, and comply with the ADA.

For relatively simple and straightforward transactions

You can speak or read information to a customer who is blind or has low vision.

You can use facial or body gestures that express information, point to information, or write notes to communicate with a customer who is deaf or hard of hearing.

You can read notes written by a customer who has a speech disability, or read or listen to the words communicated by the customer's "communication board."

Customers who are blind may also need assistance in finding an item or in maneuvering through your business's space.

For more extensive or complex communications

For people who are blind or have low vision, printed information can be provided in large print, in Braille, on a computer disk, or in an audio format (such as an audio CD, cassette, or MP3 player), depending on what is usable for the particular customer. A magnifying glass can also help a person with low vision to read printed materials.

For people who are deaf or hard of hearing, spoken information can be provided using a sign language interpreter, an oral interpreter, a printed transcript of the words that are usually spoken, or a service called "real-time captioning" which is explained later.

Usually the customer will tell you what technique he or she needs or will ask which ones you provide. Or, you can ask what technique he or she normally uses.

What visual information does your business provide?

Businesses that display merchandise, labels, or signs (but do not hand out printed materials) can usually conduct business successfully by speaking or reading information to a customer who is blind or has low vision. They can also assist a customer who is blind by locating and retrieving a product from a display shelf, describing the visual features of a product or the layout of an area, or helping the customer locate where to sign the credit card slip. Most businesses fall in this category.

Businesses that hand out simple printed materials have several options. A restaurant, for example, can have its waiters read the menu to a diner who is blind or can provide an audio recording of the menu. For customers who have low vision, the restaurant can have some menus printed in larger print or can keep a magnifying glass available for customer use (and a flashlight in low light situations). These techniques also work for small brochures, flyers, and other simple printed materials that are provided to customers. When these techniques are offered, it is not necessary to provide the materials in Braille.

Businesses that rely on printed materials to communicate extensive or specialized information must be prepared to deal with customers who use different techniques for absorbing printed information. Materials such as sales contracts or insurance policies should be made available in alternative ways, such as on a computer disk, in an audio format, in Braille, or in large print, so the customer can adequately study the information.

The important thing is to find out what technique(s) a particular customer can use.

What oral information does your business provide?

For short, simple conversations, most businesses can successfully communicate with a customer who is deaf or hard of hearing by using gestures and notes.

For standardized tours and similar activities, businesses can provide a printed transcript of the words that are usually spoken, so the customer can follow along during the tour.

For legal or medical consultations; house, loan, or auto negotiations; training programs; and other extensive conversations, businesses must be prepared to deal with customers who use different techniques for absorbing oral information.

Generally, a sign language interpreter is required for complex communications when the customer's primary method of communication is sign language.

An oral interpreter may be required to communicate with a customer who has been trained to speechread (read lips). Normally, only about a quarter of English words can be seen on the mouth. An oral interpreter uses specialized mouth and hand gestures to reinforce what the speaker is saying to the customer.

Many people who lose their hearing later in life never learn sign language or speechreading. When it is necessary to communicate orally with a customer, face the customer, speak clearly, do not cover your mouth or chew gum, do not turn away while speaking, be sure your face is well-lighted, minimize background noise and distractions if possible, use gestures or point to printed information to reinforce what you are saying, and rephrase any statements the person does not seem to understand.

Obtaining visual and oral communication services

You can ask customers to notify you in advance if they need any specialized services. It is a good idea to familiarize yourself with agencies that provide these services in your area, so that you will be prepared when the need arises.

Some services, such as an audio recording of a menu or a large print version of a flyer, can be prepared in-house with a business's own equipment.

You may not charge the customer extra to cover the cost of any services needed to communicate effectively. You should consider them as part of your overall cost of doing business.

You cannot require customers to bring their own interpreters. However, if a customer prefers to bring his or her own interpreter, the ADA permits you to accept this arrangement, if agreed upon in advance. In a case like this, you are responsible for paying the interpreter's fees. If a customer shows up with an interpreter unarranged, you are not obliged to use or pay for the interpreter's services, unless you agree to do so.

The ADA has limits on how far a business must go in providing effective communication. Businesses are not expected to provide any services that would "fundamentally alter" the business's goods and services or that would cause an "undue burden".
